"What's good Joe. Its finally Hallowean day. My mom said I should start writing in this journal she got me a week back ago. She said it will help me move forward and not focus on what had happened in my past with ---- ---- . Were in the car right now driving to the fall fair, Mom and dad said that the fair at the old man's house will conclude at sunset, which is good because then at sunset I can meet up with the bois and won't be forced to spend time with my younger brother. He's sitting next to me in the back seat right now. He's wearing a Jack Schelington costume. And apperently this morning was when he learned how to whistle because he wont stop. Sigh. He also carved a Jackolanturn this morning and put it on his head to make his costume "cooler" but I think it just maked him look dumber than dumb. It dropped from his head after walking a few feet outside from the house on our way to leave for the fair. It gets better, he even tripped on the remains after it fell of his head and he fell backwards, it was bloody brilliant. He sulked halfway through the ride until mom told him he could carve a new one at the fair. Now hes all jolly. Sigh. I hope we don't have to stay there for too long.

"Just arrived at the old mans farm. ----- is so excited about the freakin pumpkins. This is gonna be a long afternoon. I was going to bring my D.S. and sneak away in the middle of all of it but my mom saw me put it in my pocket and she took it. Sigh. I guess were going to the pumpkin carving station. I'll update when that's over with Joe."

(Below this paragraph of the page says:) " I guess it wasn't so bad. ----- locked in the second he chose his perfect pumpkin and started carving. He wouldn't even look up or react at all when I noticed and asked him where our parents went missing. I don't get his sudden obsession with his Halloween persona but I guess bro. I'm kinda worried though because I zoned out without any distractions from the thoughts from coming and I can't remember what time we saw our parents last at. Could have been thirty minutes or a few hours.. I can't remember.. Nevermind. It's fine they'll turn up eventually.

" -----'s done with his Jackolanturn. He seems proud of it. I'll admit it does look better than the one he carved and smashed this morning. Actually, it looks alot better. Like it looks cut more cleanly than how mom and dad had cut theirs to put on the front porch a while back. It's almost a bit creepy.. After he had finished his Jackolanturn, he got this dark, moody kind of facial expression. I don't know why he's acting so weird, like who starts acting depressed after making such a perfectly carved jackolanturn?? He just got it to balance on his small head. Wanna bet it drops in no longer than five minutes, Joe? Alright Joe, alright. I was thinking that we should go check out the petting zoo-thing they got in the farm and check out the farm animals they got there. I heard from some kids running past us while we were carving that there's an alpaca in there. I don't know what an alpaca provides for the farm but what the hell I want to see one. We were just walking towards the farm, I noticed that there were only kids left in there and their parents vanished off to somewhere too, a good amount of them were actually -----'s age, which is neat because I thought maybe he might be able to find some friends to trick or treat with tonight. We were about to walk through the open farm doors when ----- tugged at sleeve so hard that it hurt and pulled me back. I was about to make this his last Halloween when he lifted his arm and pointed to the wheat grain maze and said that he saw Mom and Dad walk in there a second ago. I was about to tell him I'm not playing these games but when I looked back to his face.. I could see his eyes through the Jackolanturn on his head.. his eyes were dilated for some reason, which was really weird, and his face was looking pale like he had seen a ghost. I looked down at my sleeve and noticed that his hand was shaking. I became concerned about him and why seeing our parents go into the wheat maze made him react in this way.. I told him that it was all good and we can go into the wheat maze and see where mom and dad had gone. I left my Jackolanturn on the carving table and took his hand as we made our way into the wheat maze. What made things really weird was after we entered into the maze, I heard a bunch of small footsteps behind me, similar to -----'s. I looked back and saw all the kids from the petting zoo coming out of the farmhouse and starting running to catch up to us and started walking in a group behind the both of us. I stopped and asked them if they knew where their parents who were also with them earlier had gone to, and they all shook their head and pointed to the wheat maze.. Man. I just wanted to go trick or treating with da bois today.

So then, we all made our way into the wheat maze, with me and my brother walking in front and the kids huddled in a group trailing us. We couldn't hear any signs of life from the wheat maze. I turned around and said that we should split into groups to go through each path of the wheat maze. The group of children were pretty reluctant to the idea in fear of getting lost going without me, but I told them that I lowkey didn't care and told them to grow some. I looked at my brother. His Jackolanturn is still staying pretty nicely on his head, not moving back and forth or turned to a side risking itself to fall off and smash onto the ground. The only part that's really easy to see of his face is his eyes. Since we've entered the wheat maze, his eyes have become even more dilated than before.. I can't figure out why though. They also have this sudden emptiness about them that's starting to concern me too. And his hands are becoming colder, which, I mean, makes sense because it's fall- and it's literally Halloween, and plus the sun is... oh shoot the sun. It's.. starting to set. Sigh. Next year I'm staying inside gambling on Cookie Run Kingdom until it's time to trick or treat with da bois. I sorted the kids into small groups and told them which path each group to go to until it was just me and my brother left in front of the wheat maze's entrance. I took his hand and both together we went into the path in front of us and entered the wheat maze.

We walked for quite a bit. I soon lost track of how many of our turns had been in the left direction and how many turns had been in the right direction.. ----- is walking in front now and he seems to know where he is going. I have no idea how but it seems thus so. He said something weird a few minutes ago. He said he knew this place before. He said he'd been here and done this maze before in a dream he had had a week before today. He said he even remembered small and miniscule details of the maze, and of this whole place, this whole farm.

Notes for future page's writing's/idk confronting the younger brother meeting him for the first time face to face of the game potential dialogue for that if it gonna be dark i may have traumatised the characters just a bit just a tiny bit: write "did you notice how I started writing in a different tense? You don't write like that, Caleb. Or can you even remember that name? Do you even remember how long you've been trapped down here?? Every time you've fallen down and got back up, you have that same confused look in your eyes that soon turns into determination, as if you and I were still the same innocent little kids we were all those years ago.. How long are you going to keep doing this, brother? There is no "exit", there is no prize waiting for you at the end of these mazes, after all this running. Deep down you have to understand that already. I've had to watch you be a fool over and over. Kind of like you watched me make a fool of myself when we were still people. What has come of us.. with everyone gone.. mom and dad.. I remember how you would say that we just had to keep going, to keep searching, to have hope. But that was so long ago. And what's become of us. How did this- this hellhole- turn us, into these.. monsters.. The things we had to do to even make it a couple of years after that day..that-that godamn day.. I.. I'm so sorry. We could have lived, we could have avoided this hell, and gotten help. But I screwed any hope we had at escaping, for everyone. I'm sorry, Caleb. I'm sorry I led you and the others into the maze. I'm sorry for what happened to our parents, and that we couldn't save them from their fate.
